to be carried on the mother's back they must sit, sleep and eat in the western half of the house. The eastern half is reserved for parents and adult visitors. They cannot sit on the same level with a parent, as on the same bench, but must sit lower. Among the Menabe gentes of plateau origin, who use elaborate wooden bedsteads, children must not sleep on the parents' bed while the latter are still alive, or in beds of any sort before they are married. When a son marries, or when he becomes rich and wishes to set up an establishment of his own, he may not use a bed until he has made a new one and presented it to his father with 0.20 franc in money. If a child, even when grown, kills a chicken, he must give the rear half to his father and if his parents live at a distance it is salted and sent to them. I knew of one instance in which a son's failure to do this was the straw that broke the camel's back. His father, already tried to the limit of endurance, formally disowned him. The first piece of cloth that a girl weaves without help must also be given to her parents, but they compliment her and may hold a small feast in her honor.

These regulations are all ancient and it is believed that their infraction is highly offensive to the ancestors. The child will be punished by illness or bad luck even if the parents choose to ignore the offense. The evil effects can only be averted by undergoing a ceremony called tahina. The child comes to the parent with a gift of a piece of silver money and begs pardon. If this is granted, the parent takes the silver and puts it in a dish of water. He then counts: "Iso [one], Rua [two], Telo [three]," and says: "Grant that we may have good health and a good life, Andriamanitra, Andriamananary. I pray to you because our child has committed a fault before you. He has asked pardon, bringing silver. I pardon him now, so that the evil may be averted and nothing come of it, neither sickness nor misfortune. I pardon him so that everything may prosper, so that there may be a good rice harvest, and so that the children may be attended by good fortune." He then takes some of the water in which the silver has been steeped and asperges the child with it six times, counting. At the sixth sprinkling he says: "I bless you that you may have good health and good life."

CHILDHOOD

There is no formal separation of the sexes at any stage in their development. Up to the age of five or six the boys and girls play together, but as they grow older they are drawn apart by their divergent interests. Half-grown boys and girls are rarely seen
